

Autism: Making sense of Sensory!

A detailed insight in to the sensory world of autistic children

People with autism have said that the world to them, is a mass of people, places and sounds which they struggle to make sense of, and which can cause them considerable anxiety.

Autistic learners sense the world around them in a highly individual way. It's vital for practitioners to understand how sensory processing and sensory sensitivity differences affect learning and behaviour.

This workshop will help you investigate sensory differences and develop a support plan which incorporates positive and protective strategies.

Topics covered includes; hypo and hyper sensitivity, sensory processing, the evidence base for practice, the individual perspective, sensory rooms, sensory plans. With Chris Barson
